

True Meaning of Modernization

One February day in 2015, the respected Comrade Kim Jong Un visited the Pyongyang Cosmetics Factory.

Being shown around the factory, he gave advice on how to improve the quality of cosmetics.

At the sci-tech learning space he saw some workers sitting at the computers for online lectures after their shift.

He watched them for a good while and asked about the operation of the sci-tech learning space and the computer network. Looking at a computer screen in front of a worker, he said with delight that every unit he had visited had a sci-tech learning space and was operating it on a regular basis.

Being guided into a sample display room, he said: Officials and workers should have high ambitions and compete with one another. They should also work hard to enrich their knowledge of science and technology and improve their technical skills. In other words, modernization of their factory should go hand in hand with the advancement of their knowledge.

This was a concise definition of modernization.

The officials hardened their pledge to promote the training of talented personnel in parallel with the modernization of equipment so that the factory could maintain regular production on the strength of science and technology.
